Pause

Our lives are a continuous series of actions: we move, make decisions, form new relationships... And every now and then, for personal reasons, or simply because life forces us to, we have to stop, give ourselves some time to think. And that's when we realise if what we thought was so important until then really matters or not, whether we've been focusing on the right things and really paying attention to what is going on around us. It's in times of change that we look at ourselves properly and take time for a bit of healthy introspection. For someone who is tattooed, this is even simpler to do: all you need to do is take a look at yourself. You can simply cast an eye over your own skin, look at the freeze frames of your life and at which image seems to have best expressed what you wanted to say. In the same way, we can engage in a little self-criticism and understand what it is we would rather not do again: a name that no longer occupies the same place in our life as it did when we had it done, a portrait that we wouldn't do now, or a piece that has lost whatever it was that made it so magical at another moment in our life. So, if you find yourself at a moment like this, we'll try to be there for you and keep you virtual company. Because criticism - if that is what you're feeling - of what we've done before, can be the point of departure for something new, a real tattoo. Maybe with a little more maturity, a bit more careful research, you'll manage to come up with the ultimate tattoo, the one you'll never regret, the one that will go with you for the rest of your life. A silent presence, day in day out it will act as a sort of mirror for your soul. And we're not talking about size here. A body suit can have the same value as a little empty circle. The meaning it has for you - whether it's a woman, a diamond, a heart, an angel or even an alien, the image that says the most to you, well, choose it carefully. Take your time thinking it over and decide whether that one really is the ultimate tattoo that each of us comes across sooner or later in our lifetime.
