Little points in time

One of the questions we are increasingly asked especially by young people we run into at the various conventions is whether there's there any way to get a tattoo that isn't permanent. Our answer is always the same. What is the point in getting a tattoo if, as the needle and ink first touch your skin, you are already thinking of a moment in time when it won't be there any more? The essence of tattoo doesn't seem as clear these days as when it was simply done for its own sake and there was no talk yet about it being something 'artistic'. The idea of tattoo is being twisted by all these youngsters hankering after a design, a motto or a little piece of artwork to wear on their bodies. It's only a surrogate for a real tattoo, without rhyme or reason, which will indeed end up being cancelled over the years... until it becomes a stain that blemishes the skin, a blotch without outline or shape. But is it really worth the bother? Might they not be better off just forgetting about the notion of temporary decoration and playing around with transfers until they are really ready for something indelible? A real tattoo should stay the same over time, it has to bleed and keep its shape. It will age, and the colour will change, but that will only make it look lived in, make it look more like a real tattoo. The old-fashioned principle of moderation rules when you are come over with a craving for a tattoo. Better something small, without any ifs and buts. There are times when you can capture more in a single solitary dot than a grandiose design that is only a passing whim. And so, we hope that this new issue of Tattoo Collection will give you plenty of inspiration. Remember that behind each and every one of the images in the galleries that we have selected for you there is a person, someone who put something of themselves into the key or the heart or the candle or the diamond. Maybe, like you, they found a subject they could identify with in the pages of this magazine, and only then they went to a serious tattoo artists who gave it shape. Who will have explained to them that a tattoo isn't just an image that will gradually fade into memory along with all the other mistakes and experiences accumulated over the years. A tattoo is forever.
